What is COSHH?

You might be surprised to learn just how many things in the workplace could cause harm or illness. If you don't take the right steps to minimise the risks, the penalties can be severe.

As an employer, you must control exposure to materials that cause ill health in the workplace. This not only applies to employees, but to other people who might be on the premises such as visitors, suppliers or contractors.

The Control of Substances Hazardous to Health (COSHH) Regulations say that you must:

- identify which harmful substances are present in the workplace
- understand how people could be exposed to them and be harmed
- put measures in place to prevent harm and review whether you're doing enough
- provide information, instruction and training
- where necessary, monitor health.

The objective of COSHH is to prevent ill health by removing or adequately controlling exposure to hazardous substances in the workplace.

Steps you can take include:

- total or partial enclosures and proper ventilation and security measures
- ways of working, including supervision and training that reduce exposure

- regular maintenance, examination and testing of control measures
- regular reviews to make sure your employees follow the control measures.

Managing the way people work, the frequency of exposure and the number of employees nearby, can also help to minimise risks.
